

Laurissilva

A vegetation type strongly representative of the ecological and biological processes occurring in the evolution and development of ecosystems and communities of terrestrial, aquatic, coastal and marine plants and animals.

It embraces really representative natural habitats of recognised importance to the in situ conservation of its biological diversity, including those where endangered species of exceptional universal value from the scientific or conservation point of view are to be found.